Volume 21 - October 2013

New housing subdivisions and many upscale communities often have on-site sales agents working to sell the builder or developer's real estate. While these agents may sometimes have extensive experience with that property, they may NOT be looking out for a buyer's best interests overall when another more suitable property could be found elsewhere. Not only that but some site sales agents aren't REALTORS®.

Using a Buyer's Agent is undoubtedly the smart move when looking to purchase a home in any community. Since working with a buyer's agent shouldn't cost the buyer any money, there is no downside to utilizing an agent like Team Woodall to protect & promote your interests.
